“ To the many great friends and family members,
I had once heard a story of which I have kind of adopted as my own. It was about a man who refused to go to funerals or wakes. He claimed that the “time to honor” a person, was when they were alive. Not when they were being laid out for all to see him or her in this un-natural physical state. It was so painful for him to see the deceased’s family and friends grieving and saddened because of what things they didn’t do or say when he or she were alive. The Point of this note is that during my 44 years of being married into this family, I have witnessed the entire Ittner family’s actions to be exactly of what the man of the story spoke of. I saw a brother honoring his sister, toddlers growing into teens and then young adults, all the while visiting and sharing their lives with their grandparents. I saw 2 respectful sons giving back to their parents and including them in every aspect of their own busy lives. And Charlie, the kindest Friend I’ve ever had, loving and helping Liz with whatever was asked of him. I saw these acts of kindness and honor performed each time I visited. Perhaps they were things that were of no things of great significance to anyone at the time, but to Liz they all meant a great deal and she cherished every one of them. She told Pati and I so every visit. Up until this day, today; all our visits to Atlanta have always been uplifting, seeing all the Ittner family member’s interaction, and how they each set aside time from their busy schedules & commitments to honor, respect and love Liz and Charles.
Personally, throughout these many years, I chose to honor Aunt Liz each visit by attempting to eat my weight in pound cake and 7 layer salad.
Liz, rest in peace, you have earned it.

“ Liz, Charlie, my husband Paul and I were friends since the early fifties. She was one of the dearest friends in my life. We chatted often, sharing recipes, family, etc. Since I am 85, and live in Smyrna, getting across 285 became a problem. I loved Liz dearly, and oh, how I will miss her. She was one of the sweetest, kindest people I knew.
